Tender loving care is back in nursing

Curtis E. Whalen

Tender loving care was the watchword in the early days of nursing, when nurses were responsible for the care of every patient in the ward. However, in recent years, the emphasis has shifted to more impersonal and efficient nursing. But now, nurses are returning to their roots and providing the kind of care that was once common.

In a recent article, the Chicago Tribune reported on the efforts of nurses to bring tender loving care back to the hospital. The article highlights the work of the University of Chicago Nursing School, which has been at the forefront of this movement.

The nursing staff at the University of Chicago Nursing School have been working to create a more nurturing environment for patients. They have implemented new policies and procedures that focus on patient comfort and well-being. In addition, the school has provided training to nurses on how to provide tender loving care.

One of the key components of tender loving care is the nurse-patient relationship. Nurses are encouraged to spend more time with patients, listening to their concerns and providing emotional support. This approach has been shown to improve patient outcomes and satisfaction.

The return of tender loving care is also reflected in the way nurses interact with patients. Instead of being overly formal and distant, nurses are now more approachable and friendly. They are more likely to engage in conversations with patients and make an effort to learn about their interests and hobbies.

Despite the challenges of providing tender loving care in today's fast-paced hospital environment, nurses are committed to making a difference in the lives of their patients. They understand that the care they provide can have a significant impact on a patient's recovery and overall well-being.

In conclusion, the return of tender loving care is an important step forward in the field of nursing. By prioritizing patient comfort and well-being, nurses are demonstrating their dedication to the care of their patients. As the article in the Chicago Tribune highlights, the University of Chicago Nursing School is leading the way in this crucial area.

The return of tender loving care is a reminder of the importance of human connection and compassion in medicine. As nurses continue to work towards this goal, they are setting a powerful example for the entire medical community.